

TOSH (COMEDY CENTRAL) TRASHES TRINITY

Bill Donohue comments on the Comedy Central program "Tosh.0" that aired last night:

Daniel Tosh hosted a mock game show, "American Christians got hella Talent" which featured the "Holy Trinity of judges." God was represented as an empty chair. Jesus was described as being fond of "fishing for men" [gay innuendo]. And the Holy Ghost was someone with a white sheet over his head. The judges commented on a series of faux performers.

The first act was "Fr. Flanagan and the hairless angels." A man dressed as a priest did a provocative dance with two young boys dressed as altar boys. The dance ended with the priest hugging the boys. Tosh said, "that's a slippery slope Fr. Flanagan." After the performance the judges offered their comments; Jesus refused to judge the man, and God responded "we're here to judge, don't be such a p*ssy."

Another act featured a rabbi who the judges disqualified. Tosh asked the judges "[are] you still upset about that whole crucifixion thing?" As the panel watched other fake contestants, Tosh interjected at one point, "you can cut the tension in this room with a nail through the palm."

The sketch ended with a bizarre sequence about the film "X-Men" and included God defending X-Men's director, Bryan Singer, against recent accusations that he sexually abused children.

Tosh has crossed the line before – he has a history of painting all priests as pedophiles and attacking the pope – but this was a new low for him.

Contact Carl Folta, Executive VP, Corporate Communications, Viacom: Carl.Folta@viacom.com