

Defending Religious Liberty

Anti-Catholicism needs to be combated as much as any expression of bigotry.

Since 1973, the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights has been defending the right of Catholics to be free from discrimination. We have made great progress. Unfortunately, the same is not true of defamation against the Catholic Church.

Not only is the Church under attack, religious liberty is under assault. Cruel invectives are routinely spewed against Church hierarchy, and public policy initiatives burden all Catholics, including laity.

No other organization in the United States has a better record going to bat for priests and bishops, as well as the rank-and-file Catholic, than the Catholic League.

Catholics have been targeted by activist organizations, the arts community, schools and universities, government officials and agencies, the entertainment industry, and the media. And there has not been enough pushback. That's where we come in.

We hit hard, but always above the belt. We publish the results of our work 10 times a year in Catalyst, a journal that details our response to Catholic-bashing. Win or lose—we have scored many important victories—we are always in the thick of it.

Anti-Catholicism needs to be combated as much as any expression of bigotry. Every demographic group has its top civil rights organizations. Catholics have the Catholic League.
